Thanks Giving For Single African-American Mothers Raising their Sons

By Anthony L. Bouyer

Guest Column

I would like to take a minute during this holiday season to salute all of the single African-American mothers who have guided their sons in pursuit of academic excellence.

There has been a plethora of negative literature on low academic achievements of African-American males which has presented a seemingly hopeless picture of the possibility of reversing long-standing trends of academic failure.

However, the mainstream media does not give much attention to the academic success many African-American males achieve. One important factor in this success is the influence of their mothers. It is these single African-American mothers who found the resolve and resilience to transform their sons into high academic achievers and to them I give honor.

But this is not only my personal observation. If we dig into research that has been conducted during the last decade, we can find considerable evidence that identifies common characteristics of successful single African-American mothers and the strategies they use to help their sons beat the odds. Above all, research points to the importance of mothers in helping their sons develop resilience.

Differences in life experiences dictate how individuals respond to and utilize resilience. For individuals who have never had to respond to adversity resilience is not a factor in their world view.

There are many forms of resilience and the concept is used in a number of different fields and consequently yields a number of definitions. For the purpose of this article, academic resilience is defined as academic achievement when such achievement is rare in the face of adversity. In this sense, resilience is treated as an outcome.

Anthropologist Jonathan Gayles (2005) has noted, “For many African American students, especially those educated in urban or inner-city schools, academic success is contingent on their ability to demonstrate resilience in the face of racism, poverty, and environments with few resources.” Gayles found that the students he studied developed resilience as a response to society’s expectations of these African-American male students’ social economic status and they prevailed academically despite those low expectations.

Family and Community Support for Resilience

Families and community assume an important role in how resilience is formulated for African-American males, particularly for communities and families who have been beset with difficult environmental, social and other adversities that test the sure survival of these two institutions. Sociologists Quentin Robinson and Jason Werblow (2012) examined “the ways in which single Black mothers influence the educational success of their sons by focusing on the mothers’ academically successful high school Black males.”

Single African-American mothers have consistently been the cornerstone of the African-American community, whether their singleness is due to voluntary absence of the father (possibly due to fathers themselves who were raised without fathers to help them develop a sense of parental responsibility) or involuntary (possibly due to incarceration or early death due to social conditions that many African-American men succumb to in urban areas). In many cases, African-American mothers have admirably taken on the role of both mother and father in such households.

Fear Is as Fear Does ....

Guest Column

Based upon the horrific events in Paris and with the continuing threats of ISIS to attack locales in the US of A, politicos are taking their cues to preeen as men with muscles of steel...even if their brain power is as malleable as tin...before their targeted audiences who are registering a nine out of a ten on the Richter Scale of fear.

Case in point: Donald Trump is bragging to sold out audiences that if he is president, he would “bomb the s out of them!” (oil fields controlled by ISIS) and would set up a Muslim database to track Muslims in this country.

Of course, such red meat thrown to a base that is seemingly shaken and afraid of the unknown, is something that a craven politico can do knowing that the fawning media will cover such braggadocio statements and his audience will quite literally...gobble it up.

Senator Ted Cruz, not to be outdone by the reality TV star, gets on national media and literally dares President Obama to come back to the States and insult him to his face regarding remarks Obama made in Europe about the crassness of Cruz’s remarks about having a religious litmus test for incoming Syrian immigrants.

Now it is pile on day with the Republican candidates jockeying for media time; and now, to show how tough and ready they are to fight ISIS, they are uttering bellicose statements that in other calmer times, they would disavow.

But, these are not calmer times. Not by a long shot. The world is being captivated by everything ISIS says or does. And, besides it does not hurt TV ratings if the media brings on for some of their rapid interviews a former military expert or a brainiac from a unknown think tank who will amp up the interview with, “ISIS will be at your local Wal-Mart unless we take severe action, NOW!”

Muslims everywhere are taking a tough rap due to the barbaric acts of a few who invoke the Koran as their template to justify their actions against the infidels inside their faith or the devilish West for their loose lifestyles and decadent morals.

Everyone has an opinion as to what it will take to contained or destroy ISIS and cut off the tentacles that are seemingly reaching worldwide and spawning affiliates in other countries.

The same culprits are brought out by the social scientists as to try to explain away the causes of ISIS: poverty, anger, rage, disrespect for the Koran, invasion of their countries by foreigners or military occupiers and lack of assimilation of Muslims into their host countries.

Police, military and intelligence services are befuddled because their enemy is both overt as to their bombings and covert as to their increasing sophisticated use of technology to frustrate the police in trying to corral them.

President Obama was prescient when he said that it is nigh impossible to pinpoint a lone wolf who is radicalized and who is willing to die for his or her perceived cause.

Of course, that explanation was not good enough for the rabid Republicans who want to see a Man of Steel in the White House who will issue pronouncements of death and doom on a slippery foe who will forfeit their own lives for what they perceive as their greater cause.

The jingoists would love nothing more than to have dozens of military transports carrying thousands of heavily armed GI’s to an every changing Mid-East front line and to fight a foe that is somewhat akin to the Viet Cong who in Vietnam could skillfully merge into the local populace so one could not tell who is friend or who is foe.

If the Republicans had their way in Congress, it appears that their chant would be: “bomb and then bomb some more!” Everything is reduced to the simple equation of: gunpowder equals diplomacy.

If we are going to characterize this “war” as us against them, Christians against the Muslims, people are going to have to be prepared to wait this one out for a while because history informs us that when ideologies clash, both sides dig in and neither side wants to repent.

President Obama is smart to demand that if there is going to be a long and convoluted engagement, then the front line troops must be populated by the surrounding Muslim nations that, to date, are quite satisfied with sending money and blood to fight their war for them.

Tell me. When have you seen the Saudis or the Jordanians or the Turks issuing statements that they are willing to send regiments of their fighters to the front line and spend their purses for their support for a war that could take many years to finish. Even then you have to replenish what you destroyed and bring back and resettle millions of displaced refugees?

You won’t see that unless and until such countries determine that they have a vital stake in fighting ISIS or fellow Muslims on a battle field for it is too easy and great for propaganda purposes to stylize the conflict as They (Christians) vs. Us (Muslims) instead of orthodox Muslim theology vs. radical Muslim theology.

When the political yippers and yappers start their blustery nonsense of “Send in the troops!” simply ask: do they have any family members wearing military garb? and if not, are they willing to reinstate a draft so that both the rich white boy and the poor black boy can have an equal chance to die in a desert or have an equal chance to be beheaded by a jihadist or return home in a wheelchair?

Because if the US military is to go fight as part of a coalition force against ISIS, you can bet the farm that the makeup of the US soldier on the front line against a soldier with a first name of Mohammed or Al-Aziz will not be a college grad or a young Wall Street broker or a newly-minted congressional intern but rather the working kid from a McDonalds or a Seven-Eleven or the part-time stock boy from Target. Betcha!

In these days without a draft, America does not send its best educated or rich kids to fight wars.

UPDATE: For all of you Ben Carson followers, his poll numbers are dropping like a rock. Why? His thin plastic answers are going nowhere fast; and his recent and off-setting remarks of putting the words “rabid dogs” in a discussion about vetting Syrian refugees is dumb on top of dumb!

“NETWORKING”- Part 2

Getting The Most Out Of Our Developing Network

By Zahra Aprili

Soulcial Scene Contributor

Last month in “A to Z” we started a dialogue about building a rewarding and effective network. When we start building the relationships in our network, it is important that we have a plan of action that we are able to follow.

There are many different opinions on how people should approach networking, it is up to you to experiment and develop what works best for you.

As I said before, having a network means having relationships and it is up to you to communicate clearly and nurture each of those relationships. Just in case you forgot, my three important steps to building up your relationships are: FIRST CONTACT, EVALUATION and MAINTENANCE.

Last month we dived right into step one and I challenged you to reshape your approach to networking and take time during this month to meet new people. How did you do?

Did you make yourself available to meet someone new? Perhaps you decided instead to reach out to an acquaintance you did not know very well and begin a conversation? Whoever you chose to engage, I hope the steps I gave you helped you to feel confident in your process.

Remember step one in your network building is FIRST CONTACT.

1. KNOW YOUR PURPOSE
2. SHARE INFORMATION
3. SHOW GENUINE INTEREST
4. EXCHANGE CONTACT INFORMATION.

Now that you have some prospects for your growing network let’s look at the next step. It is hard to nurture and maintain multiple relationships. That is not to say that you should not follow up with all the people with whom you have exchanged contact information.

I am only stressing that when it comes to developing our network we must use discretion as we grow our circle. We cannot nurture a relationship everyone. If a person has more question marks (?) than stars () adding them to your network may only stretch you thin as you begin to grow, share of yourself and maintain your growing network of relationships. Star () and question marks (?) are the difference between following up with:

() – “Hi Jane Doe, It was really nice meeting you yesterday. I’m really interested in learning more about what you do with organization 123. It sounded like we are working on similar projects and I would love to talk more about YOUR PURPOSE. Are you available for coffee next week?”

VS (?) – “Hi John Doe. It was great speaking with you the other day. Let’s stay in touch; I may be able to point you in the right direction for the project you mentioned.”

Remember EVALUATION is the next step in growing your network. Make sure you follow up with everyone you connected with last month. How about setting a goal of making three new December connections using the four steps of FIRST CONTACT and funneling those November connections using the four steps of FIRST CONTACT and funneling those November connections using the four steps of FIRST CONTACT and funneling those November connections using the four steps of FIRST CONTACT.

You answers to these questions help to determine how you proceed. If a new contact has multiple stars, take it as a sign that this is an individual that you need work on developing a relationship with for your growing network.

It is hard to nurture and maintain multiple relationships. That is not to say that you should not follow up with all the people with whom you have exchanged contact information.

Toledo Opera Holds Promotional Event for Upcoming Porgy and Bess

Sojourner’s Truth Staff

In February 2016, the Toledo Opera will bring the Gershwins’ monumental masterpiece, Porgy and Bess, to town. The classic American folk opera, which first played on Broadway in 1935 and at the Met in 1985, will arrive in the Glass City on February 11 for a Student Night and then again for performances on Friday, February 12 and Sunday February 14.

On October 28, the Toledo Opera board members in collaboration with Paul Hubbard hosted a pre-performance event at Our Brothers Place featuring local singer Karen Harris (Lady K) and a performance by Bowling Green State University opera student LeTara Lee.

How Earlean “Queen Cookie” Mack Belcher Manages Diabetes Without Medication

By Megan Davis
The Truth Contributor

We have heard and read many times that African Americans are “more likely”... to have heart disease or to have untreated diseases. This can be attributed to lack of health care coverage, late diagnosis, not following doctor’s orders and a lack of health care plans for treatment. Yet there are a number of African Americans who are taking health matters into their own hands.

With prescriptions for just about any symptom you can tell the doctor about, healthcare and wellness have become a pill-pushing industry, offering few alternatives or extremely costly ones. Since November is National Diabetes Awareness Month, there have been and will be health fairs with free screenings but when the month is over, these resources won’t be readily available. This leaves many without any hope or motivation or the right treatment plan to manage the disease at home.

In 2010, a diagnosis of diabetes and three days on Metformin, a common medication prescribed to manage the disease, Earlean Mack Belcher decided to take a natural approach to manage her health.

When diagnosed, she had a pity party, because while she was always into exercise, she knew she needed to make a complete lifestyle change. Losing her mother in 2008 due to complications of diabetes gave her the determination to not travel the same path.

Increasing the frequency of exercise and improving her routine was something she did along with changing her diet to incorporate fresh fruit and vegetables. With these simple changes, her blood glucose levels returned to normal range.

After applying for “My Mercy Makeover,” sponsored by 13 ABC, she and two others were selected out of 100 applicants to participate in the program. After working out in this program and with the changes in her eating habits, she lost 55 pounds. “As the universe would have it, I applied for the program in 2009,” she says, “but almost didn’t go through with it.” Throughout the program, she was featured on 13 ABC’s Full Plate twice, hosted by Rebecca Regnier and has shared her story with viewers.

As a part of her wellness journey, Earlean dedicated herself to three to six days of working out per week, which helps her maintain a normal glucose level. Walks along nature paths inspires the “meditation is medication” approach to wholeness and healing. It also helps reduce stress.

Having natural hair also reduces stress as she is able to exercise freely and shampoo her hair as often as needed without worries about maintaining her style or sweating it out. A constant motivation is her son, four grandchildren and her very supportive husband of nearly 36 years “King Denny”, who has also lost 50 pounds by subscribing to the same eating habits and working out alongside her.

Retiring from The Blade in 2001 after 14 years and after working at AT&T for 19 years, Earlean took a chance at an open mic in 2013 at Fat Fish Blue when she was 63. Her weight loss and natural approach to living gave her the courage to venture into comedy and that night, she was well received.

Later that year, after attending another comedy show at Fat Fish Blue to see Oscar award winning actress, Mo’Nique, the actress/comedian approached Earlean at her table and whispered to her that while she was on stage, she stared at her and felt a “universal connection”.

Chestnuts Roasting on an Open Fire …

By Mary Louise

This song always reminds me of my childhood Christmases. My sister Lydia and I love singing this song these days at Christmas time. As little girls we remember sitting on the living room couch waiting on our other sisters and our grandmother, Tudda, to finish getting ready for church.

I remember the colorful ribbons in the long ponytails and fancy dresses. Meanwhile, as we waited, we could hear the Christmas music playing and the smells of brown sugar, butter, coconut and nutmeg that permeated the whole house. I can still smell Christmas.

I still remember gazing at Tudda’s Southern Coconut Cake in that tall glass cake dish with that red cherry on top. I still have memories of telling her, ‘I can’t wait to have some coconut cake and some ice cream.’

Of course, I could not have any until after church. And church involved a Christmas play in which my family would have a huge part.

On our way home, my sisters and I would be looking out the window while Tudda was driving. We would be urging her to drive faster. “We’re hungry, Tudda … we want some cake!!” And when we arrived home Tudda would have cakes and pies lined up on the...continued on page 12
Happy Holidays, everyone! With the holidays upon us, what is the likelihood that you will be invited to your company party, a family gathering or, maybe, you take on the challenge of hosting your own party this year.

Either way, what’s your plan?

Do you take a gift for the host, prepare your favorite dish to show off your cooking talents, take a date, wear something from the closet or buy something new or do you decide to kick back and enjoy as quiet holiday season at home. Whatever you do, party with a purpose!

We all have stories about how our family dinners will do based on our family history. While things may have changed a bit from generation to generation, a lot of what goes on inside our homes at the dinner table remains the same. Our favorite aunt or uncle will shop up and show out, the family member who has a way of getting the party started will be there and the cousin who wants to “one up” everyone will have a list of her accomplishments that she can’t wait to share.

There will be lots of food, giving of thanks, prayer, singing and dancing, watching football, while others are around the kitchen table reminiscing about the good ole days.

You get the picture, we all have our traditions and customs that drive the flow of the holidays with family and friends and the purpose is to keep the family together, show love and give love.

To switch gears a bit, have you thought about how the holidays present an opportunity for success in your professional life? This time of the year can literally turn dining into dollars when you use proper dining etiquette and party with a purpose.

If you work for a company that throws an annual holiday party, have you ever thought about why? There are many reasons for a company to have a holiday party but there are five reasons I want to share with you. One reason is to build employee engagement and satisfaction. Another is to encourage networking with other employees who might normally only communicate by email or during a monthly staff meeting.

Also, companies have parties to set the cultural tone in the workplace. Parties are also an opportunity to build memories and thank staff and, believe it or not, parties help employers identify who should be the next employees to be promoted or demoted. Whatever the reason, it is strategic and part of their plan for the upcoming year.

When you party with a purpose, you diminish the woulda, shoulda, coulda funk. Just as the companies have a strategy, so should you.

Party With a Purpose Tips:

1. Find out who is on the guest list. Knowing who will be attending the party is a great place to start your plan of action. It is strategic to identify at least three to five people you want to make a connection with and why.

2. No business cards, please. Honor the holiday party by not turning it into a networking party. If you want to have a card readily available, take a picture of it and message it to those who ask you for a card. This way, you get their numbers that you can add to your contacts on your cell phone and they do not have to wonder what happened to your card after the party.

3. Don’t sell yourself, your product or your company. The reason why you are having the party is to celebrate your accomplishments for the year. Focus on sharing stories about the company’s accomplishments and how you are looking forward to another good year.

4. Do find the opportunity to have a conversation with the boss/decision maker. The boss wants to know who is engaged with what is happening within the company. Ask good questions. What do you contribute to your success and the success of the company? Thanks again for sending me to the production training, it really helped me on my new job. Our team is looking forward to contributing to our bottom line.

A Thank You to Voters Party

On November 16, Toledo City Councilwoman Yvonne Harper, who won election to a four-year term earlier in the month, hosted a “Thank You to Voters Party” at the Grenadier Club. Dozens of friends and supporters joined the councilwoman to celebrate her landslide victory of November 3.

Harper replaced Mayor Paula Hicks-Hudson as the District 4 representative to City Council last winter after Hicks-Hudson took over the job as the city’s chief executive upon the death for Mayor D. Michael Collins. Harper, a long-time Lucas County Democratic Party operative, was appointed to the seat by council members and won a special election in the spring.

If you are rocking locs like Queen Cookie, here are 10 tips for maintaining healthy and beautiful locs.

1. Embrace the process. Each journey is different and locs take time to develop, be patient.

2. Locs can and should be shampooed. It is often said to “leave them alone” until they loc, but all hair should be cleansed on a regular basis.

3. Slippage and unraveling is normal in the early stages. Keep up with regular maintenance (at least once a month) to encourage the hair to loc.

4. Avoid product build up by using natural ingredients that easily can be washed away. Aloe vera gel and light oils and butters that melt into the hair won’t leave build up like regular hair gel, beeswax or honey would.

5. Prevent lint in locs by keeping them tied up with a satin scarf or bonnet at night. Cotton sweaters and hats may cause dryness and breakage and may deposit fabric lint in them.

6. Avoid too tight root maintenance or styles that pull the scalp. Over time, this may cause locs to thin and eventually break off.

7. Allow your locs to dry completely before wrapping them up or placing them in an updo. Locs can mildew and could also grow mold.

8. Moisturize your locs. Even in between maintenance appointments, locs can be spritzed with water or a light leave in conditioner to keep them soft and prevent drying out or breakage.

9. Condition the scalp with light oils and a massage. This promotes hair growth, stimulates blood flow and adds sheen to the locs.

10. Eat a balanced diet, drink plenty of water and rest well to prevent stress and encourage hair growth.

Locs can be clean, healthy and grow long with the proper care and maintenance. Need more locked hair education? Visit www.theeksitchensalon.com
The Jemima Code: Two Centuries of African American Cookbooks by Toni Tipton-Martin

By Terri Schlichenmeyer
The Truth Contributor

You woke up this morning with a craving. So is breakfast time too early to think about dinner? Is it bad to want to sneak home for lunch, just to make your favorite comfort food? No, because nothing else tastes good when you’re hankering for something specific. Your stomach won’t give up until you’ve satisfied that craving, so you might as well give in a little and read The Jemima Code by Toni Tipton-Martin.

Though her upbringing in California was sprinkled with foods reminiscent of her family’s origins in the South, Toni Tipton-Martin says that “precious few” of her favorite foods “qualified as southern.” That made her, she says, “a casualty of the Jemima code,” which she defines as something that classifies the “character and life’s work of our nation’s black cooks as insignificant.”

She set out to change that.

In many libraries, cookbooks by African-American authors are lacking. “Even,” says Tipton-Martin, “the southern cookbooks were silent on the subject.” So she began to specifically collect cookbooks written by black authors, containing the knowledge and recipes of black cooks. As her collection grew, so did her understanding and she began seeing how “cooking changed, and cooks changed with it.”

From an obscure 1827 cookbook - the first one published by an African-American author (and a man!) - Tipton-Martin realized that many black cooks “existed in the culinary shadows as far as cookbook writers were concerned.” Much of their work was probably credited to white owners or employers.

Technological advances in the early 20th century altered how meals were made; science entered the picture, too, as did household worker’s unions – the latter, to the frustration of white employers, which is something African-American cookbooks quietly reflected. By mid-century, the early Civil Rights Movement could be spotted in black cookbooks.

In many libraries, cookbooks by African-American authors are lacking. “Even,” says Tipton-Martin, “the southern cookbooks were silent on the subject.” So she began to specifically collect cookbooks written by black authors, containing the knowledge and recipes of black cooks. As her collection grew, so did her understanding and she began seeing how “cooking changed, and cooks changed with it.”

First, author Toni Tipton-Martin’s history is a surprising one. Reading her discoveries of cookbook subtleties and social mores alongside recipes through the years feels like opening a multi-layered gift, and her evolution of the Mammy figure is also fascinating. Second, those recipes she found? Though there aren't a lot of them here, the ones that peek out through the pages are classic and easy to follow.

And finally, there’s a treasure-trove of pictures inside, of cooks at work and of the cookbook covers themselves, making this large-sized book one that readers will want to carry with them from kitchen to living room, countertop to easy chair. You’ll scarcely know what to look at first, or what to cook next, making The Jemima Code a book you will crave.

5. Only take a date who can add value to your current situation. Believe it or not, your spouse, children or significant other, can make or break an opportunity to advance in your organization. Some companies want the entire package – education, image, decorum and approachability – not only from the employee but also from the entire family. This is not new. Prepare your guest by making sure he knows what you do, the condition of the company and your desire to advance in the company.

6. Have a teaser. A teaser is something you say that will get the attention of an influencer without giving up the good. For example, say something such as, “our company has experienced improvement in cutting down on the amount of scrap we are creating but there are more things we can do to save the company money in this area.” If the influencer shows interest, ask if he is available to meet for lunch to discuss a solution to the problem that can add to the company’s bottom line.

7. Do not carry your cell phone in your hand. Having your cell phone in your hand during a party may indicate that you are not engaged with what is happening. Keep it in your purse or pocket until you need it to obtain information or need to take a call from the babysitter.

Deal Over Dinner

One article I like to refer to is one about an Oprah Winfrey meeting with Pulitzer Prize-winning film critic Roger Ebert at a Hamburger Hamlet years ago. Roger had something Oprah needed. He knew about film and syndicating shows and she didn’t. She thought he was only going to give her advice but at dinner, Roger used a napkin to do the math and showed her the bottom line. “Deal done,” she said.

She then knew what she needed, whom to get it from and was prepared to take action. The deal was done over dinner but they both brought something to the table and the rest is history. Seal your deal over dinner with confidence, personal integrity and respect for all.

Deadline is December 2, 2015 or until the position is filled.
The first snowfall of the winter season could not dampen the enthusiasm or lessen the turnout for the Toledo Urban Federal Credit Union’s 19th annual Appreciation Banquet on Saturday, November 21. Hundreds of supporters braved the cold and snow as they made their way to The Pinnacle to acknowledge the evening’s honorees, to celebrate the recent successes of the community organization and to listen and dance to the music of The Stylistics.

Doni Miller, CEO of Neighborhood Health Association, served as mistress of ceremonies and led off the festivities by reminding attendees that a new TUFCU facility is about to open due to the hard work of Suzette Cowell, credit union CEO, and her staff.
