Odds and Ends for the Year ...

Guest Column

When I write commentary, sometimes some things are just a mere too short as to compose a column length. So, I decided to place some thoughts, in passing, so that you can maybe run with them...or not.

One: There has been media commentary about some white evangelicals chafing at the bit about Trump’s decision to move the US embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

They wrongly believe that such a move will trigger end-time events that will lead to the Battle of Armageddon and that battle will usher in the second coming of Christ.

For those who are dancing in their pews about this move of the embassy to Jerusalem, they should maybe take about a half hour to read Biblical prophecy in context and they then will have to dash their dreams of seeing an imminent return of Jesus to planet Earth.

A move of a US embassy to Jerusalem and also acknowledging Jerusalem as the capital of Israel is not remotely listed in the Bible as a trigger point for the Battle of Armageddon.

That non-Biblical gibberish is an example of a brutal mis-contextualization of scriptures in order to serve a personal deviant belief.

According to the Bible, Jesus’ return is not based on such a geographical move but rather on a basketful of events that must gel together before such a return takes place.

To single out this embassy move as the incipient move is sheer folly and only muddies up the water insofar as certain evangelicals placing undue emphasis on his return rather than their righteous living; and not cheerleading an immoral person in the White House who does not know their God.

Two: If the Democrats do not wrest control of the House and the Senate in 2018 and present leadership remains intact, the GOP will feel embolden to gut and shred monies for both Social Security (privatize it) and Medicare and Medicaid.

If that were to happen, I think that you will see the greatest outpouring of citizens both into the streets to protest this dismantling of the America’s social safety net but also people being more political than ever before because they finally realize that being asleep while Trump tweets is dangerous to their finances and to their health.

Three: Also, if the GOP fringe nuts try to oust Bob Mueller, there will be a constitutional crisis never before seen since the antics of prior President Richard Nixon.

Any attempted ouster of the person appointed to uncover the depth and scope of Trump’s bromance with Putin and the rigging of the recent elections will cause this country to have momentous upheavals that will rival the bitterness of the Civil War when brother was pitted against brother and a nation was tortuously divided...due to slavery.

Four: When the full effect of the recently passed draconian tax laws are known and people experience its boot on their throat, many who were blinded by all things Trump will rue the day that they howled at the moon when he was elected because it will be too late to reconsider. The die has been cast.

Five: With the gap between the haves and the have nots exponentially growing with each paycheck or record-paying dividend, the bottom one half of the country’s working class population will start to understand why it is needed and necessary for a democracy to not have the top one per centers control the majority of the wealth in this country.

The one per centers are not trickle downers who want to give away some of their hoard to those who are barely scraping by with life’s necessities.

The richest of the rich are quite content to keep things as they are and to rely upon their bought and paid for politicos and police forces to maintain law and order while they while away their time in Monaco, Mar-A-Largo, Jupiter, Florida or Grosse Pointe, Michigan.

Nothing short of an economic revolution brought on by a political upheaval will cause them to realize that it is in their best interest to share a few more crumbs with the “lower” classes rather than risk being forced to live in their gated communities for fear of reprisals.

Six: According to certain polls, about 70 percent of all black babies are now born out of wedlock. It would take a month of Sundays to even begin to explain the negative ramifications such statistics have on present and future family formations for the black community.
House Democratic Leaders Respond to Flurry of Proposed Anti-worker Restrictions

Ohio House Democratic Leader Fred Strahorn (D-Dayton) and Democratic Assistant Whip Brigid Kelly (D-Cincinnati) issued the following joint statement last week in response to six proposed anti-worker state constitutional amendments:

“Taxpayers expect us to work together to increase opportunity and create jobs with wages and benefits that can sustain a family. These anti-worker, anti-family restrictions will do the exact opposite. Dangerous, divisive bills like these will only push our economy further out of balance and make people more poor and less safe on the job.”

Kaptur Statement after Voting “No” on House Passage of GOP Tax Bill

Congresswoman Marcy Kaptur (OH-09), last week issued the following statement after the House passed the final version of the GOP tax proposal:

“This bill does nothing to guarantee higher wages, create good jobs or even to prevent corporations from outsourcing jobs. This scam gives the bulk of its trillion-dollar windfall to real estate investors and the millionaire donor class. Where is the middle-class windfall?”

“The American people deserve better than this tax deal that was negotiated in secret and rammed through Congress in a matter of weeks. Tax cuts for the rich won’t grow the economy nor will it provide relief to the millions of Ohioans who need a leg up.”

Sykes Urges DeWine to Respect Court of Appeals Decision Upholding Local Hiring Standards

State Rep. Emilia Sykes (D-Akron) last week called on Ohio Attorney General Mike DeWine to respect the 8th District of Ohio Court of Appeals’ recent decision declaring a 2016 state law outlawing local hiring standards, House Bill 180, unconstitutional.*

“Local hiring standards represent a commitment by cities to combat underemployment and reinvest in local communities. Workers benefit from public construction projects that often include jobs with apprenticeships – clear career paths and quality on-the-job training that pay dividends beyond the duration of a single project,” Sykes wrote in a letter to DeWine.

The City of Cleveland sued the state in 2016 after the Republican-passed bill directly conflicted with the city’s Fannie Lewis law, a local ordinance requiring public construction be completed with at least 20 percent local labor. Akron similarly uses local hiring standards on more than $1 billion in public works projects.

“I was fortunate enough to serve during the worst budget crunch since the Great Depression,” says outgoing Toledo City Council President Steven Steel of his first half dozen years on council. “It was smoke and mirrors,” he adds of the tasks the council and city administration started to face in 2008 as the recession took a stranglehold on the Rust Belt.

For Steel, who arrived on Council in 2009 after several years of service on the Toledo Board of Education which continually faces financial shortfalls, the good fortune he refers to are the lessons learned and the experience gained in managing the City’s finances during such desperate times. Such lessons are invaluable at all times, even now that the big troubles have passed and the City’s revenues have improved.

Now, as things improve, Steel is term-limited from continuing on the job but he predicts that the task of managing the City’s finances won’t necessarily become any easier. During the tough times, he remembers, unions, workers and those expecting services to be delivered, tended to work together to make concessions. “Because of those concessions, when will they want something back?” he asks. “Now the difficulty is working with more money.”

However, as Steel reflects on his years of public service, revenue shortfalls have been the norm. “In my elective life, it’s all I’ve ever known,” he says. “Now that times are good, do I have to leave?” he says jokingly. However, as he packs his office in preparation for his final hours in office, Steel is ready to focus on the next phase of his life. He is looking forward to spending more time with his family and pursuing new opportunities in the community.

Larry Sykes: City Council Presidency Is Next Goal
By Fletcher Word
Sojourner’s Truth Editor

Toledo City Councilman Larry Sykes just won re-election to Council this past November and is ready to start his second term on the City’s legislative body. This term, however, he wants to add a little something special to the mix. Sykes wants to serve as president of Council and is actively pursuing that goal as he tries to round up the necessary seven votes from his colleagues.

“There are a lot of things I see as president in terms of leadership that are missing,” he says of the current structure. “We need someone who has the time to work with our new people – we have new people and we have no orientation, no guidance on how to be on City Council.”

The newly-elected councilmen (Nick Komives and Gary Johnson), notes Sykes, will be assigned to as many as five committees the moment they arrive and will “have to learn fast and quick,” he adds.

Sykes, a retired banker, certainly brings a wealth of experience to the task. He spent years on the Toledo Board of Education before winning election to City Council and, over the years, has served on dozens of boards in the community, most notably Lucas Metropolitan Housing Authority, Metroparks, United Way, Cordelia Martin and Planned Parenthood. He currently is on the boards of Lucas County Children Services, St. Vincent Mercy and the University of Toledo African American Community Advisory Committee.

“On the boards I have served on, I have left them better than when I started,” he says. “These are key boards that have impacted the lives of hundreds of thousands of people in the community.”

Sykes’ main points of emphasis for his next term include neighborhood safety, the opioid crisis, early childhood education, implementing the lead safe ordinance which he led the fight to pass, responsible banking, diversity and inclusion, government consolidation/reorganization, regional water and information technology.

Sykes, very aware of the danger posed by lead in so many old central city buildings, is very proud of his involvement in getting the lead ordinance passed. “Going into the city [government] I was able to pass a lead ordinance that had been floating around for years,” he recalls. It’s an ordinance that has set a standard for other Ohio cities.

That sort of accomplishment is why Sykes feels he has evolved from a newly-elected councilman who did not know where to park when he first...

By now, we have seen it, the rise of the black beauty industry, ignited by the natural hair movement. A completely different genre of beauty and business in the black community that celebrates melanin, hair that defies gravity, and a culture that is deeper than fried chicken, watermelon and any other stereotypical idea of who black people are. Dominated by black women who, from the heart of their kitchens, worked diligently to create a new recipe for beauty and success, the natural hair industry has created layers of businesses that are for us, by us, unapologetically.

It started with blogs often powered by google, with cute usernames like “naturalgirl” or “curl CURLOPT.” These blogs followed individual journeys of the stages of transitioning to natural hair and beyond. What came next were the “naturalgirl” or “curlydiva.” These blogs followed individual journeys of the people like the creators of Carol’s Daughter, Miss Jessie’s and Shea Moisture began to grow.

Companies like these all started in the homes of mixmasters, blending organic ingredients together to meet the growing needs of moisture, maintenance and manageability for the natural hair community. These companies have evolved from selling products out of their homes and car trunks to becoming instant successes with e-commerce websites where others outside their own communities could buy their products as well. Enter the Home Shopping Network which gave Lisa Price, Brooklyn native and creator of Carol’s Daughter, first place in natural hair care when her products became the standard for black women everywhere who wanted something made by someone that looked like us. With some special funding and brand ambassadors like Jada Pinkett-Smith, her products became the upscale line for naturals. It was as if natural hair care went “Hollywood” and natural hair had finally arrived.

Then from Long Island, New York, there came a man named Dennis Richelieu, founder of Nubian Heritage skin care and Shea Moisture hair care products. He, along with his grandmother and college friend, took homemade recipes and preparations to the next level with a brand rooted in his African heritage and became a household name in black hair care practically overnight. His products are even more widely available than others today, thanks to an infusion of investments from unlikely sources that has or his company in jeopardy. But we will come back to this.

Maybe it’s a New York thing, but there is also Miss Jessie’s, a company started by sisters Miko and Titi Branch. Their success was made from recipes in their kitchen also, trying out their concoctions on clients in their salon. Their products were all the rage until the market exploded and more mom and pop product companies rose to the occasion to establish their own companies to serve their communities. Miss Jessie’s was one of the highest-priced natural hair companies of this kind.

When these companies rose to fame so quickly, natural hair expos and conventions, would become popular events that featured several vendors, small business owners and a combination of entertainment and education. It’s here where small business development took on a life of its own. Expos like the Ohio Natural Hair, Health & Beauty Expo, held in Toledo annual, gave business owners an affordable opportunity to display their goods and services to the community and to connect consumers that a small business may otherwise not have been able to reach. The idea of these types of events has been to advertise your business to a large group of people in one day, giving you more than one way to connect with a business: meeting the owners, seeing and touching the products and learning how their good or service can work for the consumer; something that ads, especially social media shares aren’t always able to accomplish.

This is also how word of mouth, referrals and networking have made their comeback. Businesses have new platforms at local events to be showcased and the impact it has had on the Industry is immense. Coupled with changing laws in some states for natural hair stylists who are being emancipated from unnecessary licensing requirements, the new, but old age of each one reach one has powered the new black beauty industry.

Gaining momentum, natural hair styles have been trending once celebrities like Issa Rae, Viola Davis and Tracee Ellis Ross began embracing their roots publicly. Insert cultural appropriation here. A movement that was established for melanated people with Afro hair, was growing around the world. That movement became the industry that remains viable even though the threat of a certain privilege is looming above it. Because later came the cosmetology industry who developed “professional” products that had an even higher price tag, discouraging consumers from buying homemade, stating the products weren’t balanced enough for black hair. Insert the side eye emoji here, and hold it.

Picture it, New York fashion week and a barrage of pale-skinned models are walking the runway donning dreadlocks and Bantu Knots, images that women of color were outraged by not only because they weren’t represented, but also because it was as if someone snatched their child and paraded them around as if they were the “White Savior” rescuing them from themselves. This debut of African American hairstyles yielded a series of Youtube videos and short tutorials of more non-melanated women teaching their viewers

In the Mason tradition, said St. Paul Missionary Baptist Church Pastor James Willis, his church celebrates two big feast days – one for St. John the Baptist and one, in December, for St. John the Evangelist. On Sunday, December 10, leaders from the Composite Lodge #108, the Amazon Lodge #4, the Jewel Chapter #20 and the Pride of Composite #81 came to St. Paul to join the congregation in their celebration and holiday feast.

“We are about charity,” said Willis prior to the Sunday service. Willis, who served as Grand Master of the Amazon Ledge from 2006 to 2009, also spoke of the importance of his brethren staying involved with the movement “so we can take care of widows and orphans.”

The Sunday service opened with a choral introit by the St. Paul MBC Choir, a call to worship, praise hymn, invocation and responsive reading.

After the recognition of the day’s special guests, selections by the choir, a scripture lesson, prayers and chants and offerings, the proclamation was delivered by Pastor Willis – “Is There Any Room for Jesus.”

After service, the congregation gathered in the downstairs banquet room for a feast of turkey, chicken, ham, green beans, potato salad and other delicacies and desserts prepared by members of the congregation.

Toledo Chapter of Girl Friends, Incorporated held their Holiday Party Sunday, December 17 hosted by Girl Friend Constance and Boy Friend Kwaku Nantwi. Over 25 Girl Friends, Boy Friends and guests attended the festive and fun filled event. The president of the chapter is Marie Latham Bush and the social chairman is Alisha Gant.
Wayman Palmer YMCA Christmas Party

Santa showed up and more than 300 children were entertained and received toys from Santa at the Wayman Palmer YMCA annual Christmas Party on Thursday December 11. The event, which also provided a luncheon buffet for the children and their parents, featured a number of musical performances by the children and festive decorations representing the holiday season.

how to achieve these styles. Marc Jacobs, a fashion designer who has been accused of cultural appropriation more than once, was under siege in a social media firestorm over his choice in hairstyles for his runway looks. His response was “funny how you don’t criticize women of color for straightening their hair.” Touche, Mr. Jacobs.

Cultural appropriation too, has taken on a new life. Natural women were just embracing their tight coils, kinks and waves when all of a sudden, old hair care lines that previously catered to the relaxed consumer, were now developing their own curly hair lines for women of color. The problem with this is the size of these companies like Dark and Lovely, Pantene, Cream of Natural and others; their ability to get on retail shelves has been and still is a lot easier than smaller companies to do. They may be behind in knowing black beauty trends, but their dollars and influence in the beauty market spread faster and smoother. Even with Miss Jessie’s, Carol’s Daughter and Shea Moisture, you most often had to order online, during a time where people of color were very apprehensive about purchasing anything online.

For the few natural hair product companies that saw massive success, it seemed that the buck stopped with those main three. While there are now hundreds of other smaller companies, that are chugging their way down the rail to success, the aforementioned companies pushed their product out just in the nick of time. In order to stay relevant and successful, Carol’s Daughter and Shea Moisture have been under much scrutiny for their recent financial partnerships with companies like L’Oreal, Bain Capital (which was noted to be linked to Mitt Romney) and Unilever, companies that are funded by “White Dollars” that provided an infusion of cash to these businesses in order to expand and be placed in more retail stores around the world. These decisions have left the conscious black shopper in a lurch over supporting companies that “sold out” to “the man.” People noticed, as soon as these deals were made, that their marketing changed completely and, for those who purchased products regularly, also noticed that there was a change in the formula.

In the spring of 2017, an online ad by Shea Moisture showed several white women with wavy or curly hair, complaining about manageability and maintenance until they began using the products. As quickly as this became a viral video, black women were boycotting Shea Moisture on-the-spot, and began searching for other black-owned companies to support. Of course, there were... continued on page 12

Junction Coalition Holds Christmas Party for Members and Family

On Friday, December 15, the Junction Coalition held its first Christmas party for its board members, staff and families at the Frederick Douglass Community Association. About 50 Junction volunteers and family members attended the event.

The Junction Coalition was recently honored for community work at Ohio Environmental Council State Dinner with former Governor Ted Strickland. He shared how proud he is of Toledo’s very capable Honorable Mayor Paula Hicks-Hudson, Esq., and the hard work that she is doing for the city!

Blue Gill Fishing Club’s Christmas Party

The members of the Blue Gill Fishing Club held their annual Christmas Party on December 19 at their clubhouse on Junction Avenue and the 14 members hosted greeted about 30 guests and raised funds to donate money to two worthy community organizations.

Ham, chicken, collard greens, tossed salads and macaroni and cheese were some of the menu items the members and guests enjoyed after the funds were passed out. On hand to receive the donations of $250 each were Harvey Savage, executive director of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Kitchen for the Poor and Shawna Woody, executive director of the Boys & Girls Club.

Blue Gill Fishing Club was organized in 1992 by five community men. “It was first a social club, we would take fishing trips together at least once a year. We still fish once a year, but we’ve grown in the services we provide to the community. We provide hot dogs for youth during the summer at the nearby park,” said Al Chapman one of the original club members.
questions raised when Dove did a similar thing that didn’t receive the same response. Perhaps because it was expected from a company like that to create an ad that disgraced the African-American esthetic, but when it was black, it was personal. And we still watch BET...To date, Shea Moisture barely made it past that debacle which has claimed thousands, maybe millions of consumer dollars, and now they have been acquired by a UK company, Unilever. Quite possibly, they had to sell in order to stay on the market at all after that lest they fold under the pressure of letting women of color down.

With larger corporations trying to get in on the success of what the natural hair movement has created, consumers are constantly doing research and also standing on opposing sides at times. Because the corporations have implanted their dollars into black companies, they have watered down their products and lowered the prices to sell more, but never as cheap as their own products. What used to sound like exotic, one of a kind formulas in Carol’s Daughter products such as Monoi oil, has now been emulated across retail shelves in Sally’s, Walmart and all the beauty supply stores across the country at a fraction of the price of “our” products. Consumers are constantly faced with trying to finding more for less, and the major corporations who have pushed out their own “natural” lines, make it hard for people to choose.

If these things aren’t enough to see how the face of Black Beauty is being changed, then perhaps this last example will confirm how something naturally ours is being kidnapped by those who want greenbacks off “our” backs. Locs, which is a hairstyle that requires a commitment from an individual to grow down to their waist over a period of seven-10 years, can be purchased 20 for $5.99 at any local non-chain beauty supplier. The loc jewelry that black women were making by hand and selling online on sites such as Etsy, which celebrates handmade artisans, can now be purchased five or so for $0.99. Shea butter that we can source fair trade from vendors who have partnerships with the people of Ghana is now being processed and stretched out and sold in small containers for $3.00 or more. And if your Afro doesn’t have defined curls, you can buy a bag of them for $4.99 and attach it to your own hair for free if you watch a how-to video online.

The curls that we grow naturally, in all their glory, are being worn by white models and actresses of color, by way of wigs and weaves, both items that discourage women from wearing their own hair. Let’s also throw in the fact that what once was a crown of glory, the Afro, is now a banner of shame since product companies have developed several items that stretch, elongate and smooth naturally curly hair to make it more presentable and manageable. The natural hair movement birthed an industry that was made for us by us, growing exponentially between 2007-2017 and is now being appropriated and monopolized by white and light brown people, the lowest bidders, a repeat of the Madam C.J. Walker era. Black Beauty has changed faces again, but if we have changed the industry twice before, we can do it again. Stay tuned for the next Fros, Fashions and Finds where we discover how.

elected office and thinks about the major frustrations of the past years, revenue shortfalls are not at the top of the list. There are two major frustrations that he recalls.

First, he mentions the limited ability of council members to fulfill expectations on their own. “I noticed this during the recent elections,” he says. “People [council candidates] would say ‘I’m going to fix the streets, bring in jobs, improve education.’ But council’s ability is extremely limited – we don’t determine jobs or streets to be paved; we don’t deploy. We are a liaison not a decision maker. We appropriate money but the city administration decides what to do [with that money].”

Reflecting on his relationships with the four administrations he has served with, the council president recalls good relations with all four. He singles out Mike Bell for his handling of “the most difficult of economic times” and his responsiveness to that difficulty.

Mayor Paula Hicks-Hudson has earned Steel’s admiration for her relationship with City Council. “She had the best handle on the frustrations of City Council,” he adds. “I’m going to be protecting those who are easily exploitable.”

And Steel’s second major frustration over the past eight-plus years has been with the internal workings of council. Having come from a five-body Board of Education where it was comparatively easy to put together a stable three-person majority on a variety of issues and votes, the change was dramatic.

Toledo City Council’s 12-person body requires a seven-person majority and that leads to so much more fluidity. “Here, alliances ebb and flow,” he says. “You may think someone is with you but, if they are, it is the exception not the rule.”

There is quite a lot that Steel is satisfied with as he thinks about the last eight years. Money shortages notwithstanding, Steel, a long-time Old West End resident, feels that Toledo has become a much “cooler city” in which to live – bike paths, golf carts downtown, for example, the growth of entertainment districts and commercial and retail establishments.

Companies such as Cleveland Cliffs have brought more jobs, the hospitals are growing and downtown is surging.

He leaves the 21st floor of One Government Center “cautiously optimistic” about the progress the city has made. “We’ve turned a corner with the economy and downtown – but a lot of infrastructure and neighborhoods need work.”

Even though he will no longer be an elected official, Steel’s commitment to improving the lives of his fellow citizens will remain an important part of his daily tasks.

During the last few years Steel earned a law degree and started a part-time practice in labor and employment law. He will be employed full-time in January “protecting people’s rights,” he says. “I’m going to be protecting those who are easily exploitable.”

have a stake in rebuilding the communities where they live and raise their families,” Sykes continued. “By putting money back in the hands of Ohio workers, local hiring ordinances like Cleveland’s Fannie Lewis Law are strengthening local businesses and giving workers the opportunity to get ahead. Without local hiring ordinances, investments would be more likely to flow to out of state companies and workers with no stake in the health and success of our regional economies.”

Sykes said she plans to introduce legislation in the new year that will strengthen Ohio communities’ ability to make decisions about local hiring standards.
Let’s pretend.

Let’s be cowboys, in search of our lost herd. Or you be a dinosaur and I’ll be an alligator. Let’s pretend we’re cooking dinner, crawling through the desert, exploring stars. It’s fun to be something you’re not for awhile — unless, as in American Radical by Tamer Elnoury (with Kevin Maurer), it’s a matter of international security.

Born in Egypt and raised in New Jersey by devout Muslim parents, Tamer Elnoury saw an armed man praying at a local mosque one afternoon and it made him realize that he wanted to be a cop. He’d set his sights on federal law enforcement and, shortly after graduation from the police academy, the FBI came courting but Elnoury turned them down. Post-9/11, he wondered if he’d made a mistake.

He reached back out to the Bureau. Seven years later, they returned his call.

As a newly-minted FBI agent who spoke fluent Arabic and English, Elnoury’s first task was coming up with a “legend” for his undercover work. He needed a story that was memorable and believable: a pseudonym; a fake family, and a reason for breaking the law. He had to make a target like him without questioning his identity, or he needed to “bump” the guy to “take his temperature.”

But being someone you’re not is exhausting work: Elnoury remained in his role nearly every minute he wasn’t with other agents or a “handler.” Apartments he occupied weren’t his, nor were the cars he drove. His attire had to fit the story. A case might mean several cross-country flights in a single week. Perhaps most difficult: he had to hide his own “disgust” while he continued gathering information.

That ability came in handy in his biggest case.

Elnoury was a busy agent with a packed schedule on the day he got an urgent call: the FBI and Canadian officials were investigating a “very bad guy” they believed had ties to al Qaeda — or worse. Or maybe not. Learning more would require finessing, and Elnoury’s part was supposed to be a quick “bump.”

And it chilled him to his core…

The first thing you’ll want to do before you read American Radical is this: throw out everything you think you know about Islam if you’re not Muslim.

Authors Tamer Elnoury (a pseudonym) and Kevin Maurer stress, often and specifically, what’s in the Quran and what Islamic terrorists claim is in the Quran. Those are two different things, the explanation of which makes readers understand clearly the danger Elnoury faced with a guy who might’ve been a friend, were it not for the man’s radical beliefs. Quiet mindfulness mixes with straining awareness, frustration, and “evil” then, adding to the tension of a tale and an aftermath that, even though parts of this book needed to be omitted for security reasons and conversations were partially re-created, reads like a palm-sweaty, heart-pounding thriller.

And isn’t that what you want for a long winter’s read? Eh, of course it is, so go find American Radical. You’re gonna love it, for real.

Beautiful Black Women Photoshoot #2

On Saturday December 16 at the Rustbelt Coffee shop, Kool2dos and Transitions by John Poon joined forces again to showcase some of Toledo’s beautiful black women. This was the second shoot of a three-part series. The first event was held in October.

The initial event had such a great turnout, John Poon and Keith Cook knew they had to do it again.

Rustbelt coffee is a trendy coffee shop located on Ontario in downtown Toledo. It was once an antique shop. It has beautiful exposed brick, antique wood and high ceilings, perfect back drop to showcase the beautiful women in attendance.

Nothing but good vibes filled the conference area at Rustbelt as the ladies began to arrive. The shy kittens who walked in left as confident lionesses after their personal shoot with the photographer. It was great to see women all flavors, and walks of life, enjoy good conversation, food and peach (virgin) Ciroc Bellini all prepared by Cook. He truly worked hard to treat women like royalty.

Cook has done events and promotion since he attended BGSU; he has been a comedian since 2009. When asked why he wanted to do the BBW event he stated without hesitation “The media, society and even our culture does not celebrate Black, Latino, Asian women. If no one else is going to do it, we must start with our own”.

Poon has been shooting portraits for the last eight years. He was honored to be a part of BBW event. “Black is beautiful, we were not taught to celebrate ourselves in school, they only focused on the negative aspects of our history. Black women play strong role in the home and in society.” He said. He was flattered to be a part of celebrating sisters in a positive way.

Ladies, get ready for the finale. It will be held at M’Osteria and Bar, February 3 starting at 2 p.m. Make some new friends and let JP showcase your unique style and personality. Participants have access to personal catalog online and are able to select up to five images from the shoot for $50 registration fee. JP will also print images upon request.

For more information on BBW event follow Keith Cook @koolcomedy and JP @Transitions by John Poon. To register for other events organized by Kool2Dos/Koolcomedy at www.eventbrite.com. Check out Transitions by JP online at http://johnpoon.wix.com/jptransition1
Alpha Phi Boule’s Annual Christmas Party – Christmas Is for Archousai!

The men – Archons – of the Alpha Phi Boule held their annual holiday party at the Toledo Country Club on December 5 honoring, as always, the Archousai – wives and partners of the members.

The annual Christmas party, always a black tie affair, is an opportunity for the Boule members and wives to display their finery and revel in the festive holiday spirit with their friends. And, as always, music, fine dining and conviviality mark the occasion.
